Royal families have symbols that they have been using for centuries, and they continue to use these symbols in more or less the same way. But when royal families in the past were first choosing symbols for the coats of arms, they looked to the history connected to their kingdom and to what kind of symbols seemed more 'powerful'. Years ago I worked at document management company. There is cool software that can automate aspects of hand-written forms. We had an airport as a customer - they scanned plenty and (as I said before) this was several years ago... On your airport customs forms, the "boxes" that you "need" to write on - are basically invisible to the scanner - but are used because then us humans will tend to write neater and clearer which make sit easier to recognize with a computer. Any characters with less than X% accuracy based on a recognition engine are flagged and shown as an image zoomed into the particular character so a human operator can then say "that is an A". This way, you can rapidly go through most forms and output it to say - an SQL database, complete with link to original image of the form you filled in. If you see "black boxes" at three corners of the document - it is likely set up for scanning (they help to identify and orient the page digitally). If there is a unique barcode on the document somewhere I would theorize there is an even higher likelihood of it being scanned - the document is of enough value to be printed individually which costs more, which means it is likely going to be used on the capture side. (I've noticed in the past in Bahamas and some other Caribbean islands they use these sorts of capture mechanisms, but they have far fewer people entering than the US does everyday) The real answer is: it depends. Depending on each country and its policies and procedures. Generally I would be surprised if they scanned and held onto the paper. In the US, they probably file those for a set period of time then destroy them, perhaps mining them for some data about travellers. The eSigned file will be attached to the draft email generated by signNow's eSignature tool. Just register on the admission portal and during registration you will get an option for the entrance based course. Create your eSignature, and apply it to the page. Establishing secure connection...
